When Jordan Peterson had his Google accounts shut off a few days ago, he found bottles of wine on his doorstep along with a note. It was from four Google employees who appreciated his work and were dissenting against SJW totalitarianism. They thanked him for his work and warned him to make alternate plans because this will get worse. He told us this; when the next bible lecture is uploaded you'll have the story.

It almost seems like Silicon Valley is the first communist Gulag of the 21 century western world. People with a conscience are already dissenting from within. That's encouraging, not every human soul will be brainwashed and turned into an Auschwitz guard.

There's nothing wrong with Auschwitz or the people that guarded it. Your public school/TV/Google/pop culture brainwashing is showing.

Reminds me of the bus of Jewish tourists that broke down going to Auschwitz/Birkenau. The driver finds a local farmer and explains his situation. The farmer thinks a moment. He then says, "I only have a small oven."

All discussion on this site ceases to exist when people get triggered by Muh Holofoax! That red pill is a late game pill that does far more harm than good when outreaching to others with different opinions. I'm not saying don't talk about it, just refrain from jumping down people's throats. Provide your evidence without the personal insults.

I had a lot of extended family in concentration camps. Some lived, some died. They were all Polish Christians. You can simultaneously believe that the Jews fabricate and embellish facts surrounding the holocaust for political and financial gain, and that the Germans hurt a lot of innocent people.

You should share your opinions. I work in tech and I can tell you there are lots of people that don't share the (((propaganda))) opinion. I have found people at my work that browse /pol/, Breitbart, ZeroHedge, etc... All you have to do is put feelers out there and I think you'll be surprised.

edit: if you have any gamers at your work try it out on them. Most that went through Gamergate got red pill'd in the process.

I am in a very similar position as that guy, a senior software engineer at another IT giant.

Most of us would not be devastated by getting fired, just inconvenienced. We have established careers and would easily get another well-paying job even if the economy was weak. Not to mention that any conservative who moved from Silicon Valley to a flyover state where he belongs ideologically would instantly become independently wealthy.

More importantly, firing software developers is not something you want to do without due cause. Much as we try to document our code and our processes, there is always a whole lot of consequential knowledge that lives only in our heads. A surprising amount of my work involves chasing down which dev knows why something is done some way. And often there's only one guy. We could re-create that knowledge in a couple of days of work, but that costs. I would imagine firing any one of us would create a couple of months of work. And it would compound the more people you fire. You can fire one guy, but when you start making it a habit you are really shooting yourself in the foot.

You would have to explain that. I left LA to the midwest for a short period to get out and it's a shit show. Unless you have established passive income it's not happening. Rural america has gone to shit. They are druggies and alcoholics. I have access to data on the usage rates and it's worse than people realize. Middle USA is corrupt as shit. Don't fool yoursel.f.

I try to make sure all developers get experience with every code base and demand standards for this reason. That being said, I've let two developers go who at one point we're the only devs in the org and documented nothing with little consequence. In my experience, developers worth their pay can figure out and document other's code with little trouble.

Google has it's days numbered.

They are the GE of silicone valley, a Jack Welch GE but without the decades of brand loyalty and market saturation. They survived past 15 years because of political connections and hype.

Meanwhile they kept buying smaller companies that had good ideas, but bad problems. They kept buying conflicting company cultures and poor budgeting practices.

Google is dying, and they do not realize it.

The person who wrote the document argued that the representation gap between men and women in software engineering persists because of biological differences between the two sexes, according to public tweets from Google employees. It also said Google should not offer programs for underrepresented racial or gender minorities, according to one of the employees I spoke to.

permalink parent

Carry them in what way? Maybe financially, or ideologically. But we're talking about Google here, and even if they (ab)use their market share and market power, in the long run Google has to innovate because otherwise it will vanish like so many companies before them. You need the clever guys who make the products good and if you piss all of them off, you're gonna lose, no matter how much money and political support is given.

It's like having a rich government with a lot of people's support, but with enemies around the country and not a single citizen possessing the capability of effective defense.

We'll evolve out of that cultural marxist bullshit, but with many losses, as did the Eastern European people.

While the document itself contains the thoughts of just one Google employee, the context in which they were shared—Google is currently being investigated by the Department of Labor for its gender pay gap and Silicon Valley has been repeatedly exposed as a place that discriminates against women and people of color—as well as the private and public response from its workforce are important.

It's also completely untrue. Time and time again we see these companies bending over backwards to give minorities more money, more responsibility and better positions. FFS i know people in the field who are handed managerial positions simply for being black females. The only thing that can be done is canning the AA program, and telling these minority groups to get fucked

At least eight Google employees tweeted Friday about a document that was circulated within the company calling for replacing Google's diversity initiatives with policies that encourage "ideological diversity" instead. The document, which is the personal opinion of one senior software engineer, was shared on a company mailing list but has since gone "internally viral," according to a Google employee who spoke with Motherboard.

Motherboard has not viewed the full document, but a screenshot we reviewed shows it's titled "Google's Ideological Echo Chamber." Descriptions of its contents were tweeted publicly by Google employees, and it was described in detail to me by a Google employee, who requested anonymity because of the company's notoriously strict confidentiality agreement. (A lawsuit against the company was filed in a San Francisco court last year over the company's "spying program" to prevent leaks.)

The person who wrote the document argued that the representation gap between men and women in software engineering persists because of biological differences between the two sexes, according to public tweets from Google employees. It also said Google should not offer programs for underrepresented racial or gender minorities, according to one of the employees I spoke to.

The 10-page Google Doc document was met with derision from a large majority of employees who saw and denounced its contents, according to the employee. But Jaana Dogan, a software engineer at Google, tweeted that some people at the company at least partially agreed with the author; one of our sources said the same. While the document itself contains the thoughts of just one Google employee, the context in which they were shared—Google is currently being investigated by the Department of Labor for its gender pay gap and Silicon Valley has been repeatedly exposed as a place that discriminates against women and people of color—as well as the private and public response from its workforce are important.

"The broader context of this is that this person is perhaps bolder than most of the people at Google who share his viewpoint—of thinking women are less qualified than men—to the point he was willing to publicly argue for it. But there are sadly more people like him," the employee who described the document's contents to me said.

At Google, "I feel like there's a lot of pushback from white dudes who genuinely feel like diversity is lowering the bar," a former engineering employee who wished to remain anonymous because they had signed a non-disclosure agreement told Motherboard.

Motherboard has independently confirmed with multiple Google employees that the document is being widely shared among many of the company's software engineering teams: "If I had to guess, almost every single woman in engineering has seen it," the current employee told Motherboard; a separate current employee told me it was being actively read by many employees. At several points on Friday night, the document was inaccessible because too many people were attempting to view it concurrently. Google did not respond to two requests for comment.

The document's author also wrote that employees with conservative political beliefs are discriminated against at Google and lamented about how "leftist" ideology is harmful. They argue that the company should have a more "open" culture where their viewpoint would be welcomed. The document said that improving racial and gender diversity is less important than making sure conservatives feel comfortable expressing themselves at work.

While the vast majority of Google employees did not support the document's arguments, some did. According to Dogan, who works on the company's Go programming language, the document's author was emboldened by some of the positive responses he got. "The author is now in contact with me explaining why he received supportive response," she tweeted. "If HR does nothing in this case, I will consider leaving this company for real for the first time in five years," she wrote in a threaded tweet.

"It's not worth thinking about this as an isolated incident and instead a manifestation of what ails all of Silicon Valley," the employee I spoke to who detailed the document's contents told me.

Google is currently wrapped up in a dispute with the Department of Labor over what an agency official testified are "systemic compensation disparities against women pretty much across the entire workforce." Another official told The Guardian in April that it had discovered "compelling evidence of very significant discrimination against women in the most common positions at Google headquarters."
