On Monday, Senate Judiciary Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-IA) called on President Trump to honor whistleblowers in order to “drain the swamp.”

“Whistleblowers know where the skeletons are in government,” said Grassley.

President Trump vowed to “drain the swamp” as part of his campaign promise to the American people.

For too long, the swamp creatures in DC have gone against the American voters with the Deep State bureaucracy continuing to serve special interest groups and lobbyists rather than taxpayers.

Chuck Grassley tweeted: 2day is national whistleblower appreciation day The way to drain the swamp is for the president to honor whistleblowers. whistleblowers know where the skeletons are in govt why not have a rose garden ceremony honoring whistleblowers? @realDonaldTrump

Plenty of whistleblowers have come forward since President Trump was elected, however; the Justice Department is being held hostage by Sessions and Rosenstein.

William D. Campbell, the FBI informant and whistleblower on the Uranium One scandal broke his silence in an explosive testimony to Congress in February.

Other whistleblowers in the FBI are also ready to speak about the corruption under Comey's directorship.

Another whistleblower told Rep. Ron DeSantis (R-FL) that he witnessed a senior FBI executive suggest the FBI had a personal motive and targeted Flynn with the purpose of ruining his career.

We need to get rid of AG Sessions and appoint an Attorney General who is ready to help President Trump drain the swamp otherwise there's no point in whistleblowers risking their safety coming forward.
