

Most Americans Think That Corporate Controlled Media Should Be Described As 'Enemy of The People'

27 comments

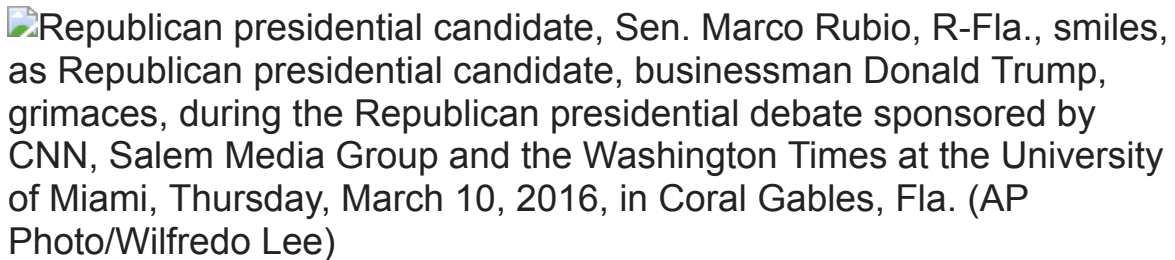

Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., smiles, as Republican presidential candidate, businessman Donald Trump, grimaces, during the Republican presidential debate sponsored by CNN, Salem Media Group and the Washington Times at the University of Miami, Thursday, March 10, 2016, in Coral Gables, Fla. (AP Photo/Wilfredo Lee)

Image by: AP

Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., smiles, as Republican presidential candidate, businessman Donald Trump, grimaces, during the Republican presidential debate sponsored by CNN, Salem Media Group and the Washington Times at the University of Miami, Thursday, March 10, 2016, in Coral Gables, Fla. (AP Photo/Wilfredo Lee)

Philip Bump, Washington Post

It's faded into the background noise by now, as does anything in politics today that's older than about 12 hours. But it's worth occasionally remembering that the sitting president of the United States disparaged the media as "the enemy of the American people" within his first month in office.

"The FAKE NEWS media (failing @nytimes, @NBCNews, @ABC, @CBS, @CNN) is not my enemy, it is the enemy of the American People!" President Donald Trump posted via Twitter on Feb. 17. 2017.